

COP15

WE TAKE RESPONSIBILITY

Since 2003, the declared ambition of transnational corporation Das Beckwerk has been to develop forms of action that will allow the average citizen to take part in the writing of world history. For six years Das Beckwerk representatives have been sent on missions to major political hot spots in Iraq, the United States, Iran and Afghanistan. They have risked their lives pursuing the objective of intervention in social and political reality in the locality, thereby to influence the way of the world.

The announcement, which is being made public in media all over the world in the days leading up to the World Climate Conference COP15, is an attempt to write world history through a so-called speech-act, solely by taking responsibility in advance for the historical events to come.

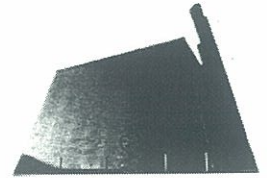

For a few days, and for the first time in history, Denmark is the centre of the world and the scene for a decisive event. "In every era there are only one or two moments when nations come together and reach agreements that make history, because they change the course of history. Copenhagen must be such a time," British Prime Minister Gordon Brown said recently, and US President Barack Obama stated that the meeting in Copenhagen "must have immediate effect".

In short: this is a unique opportunity. If the way of the world is to be changed decisively, now is the time. COP15 opens a door, and through this door we will enter to write world history.
